growth, will have to play a crucial role to support the economy in 2H amid external uncertainties.

Persistent deflationary pressures for China

- Producer prices (PPI) fell more than expected by 3.6% y/y in July (prior: -3.6% y/y), while consumer prices (CPI) were unchanged (prior: -0.1% m/m). The main drag on CPI on prices came from food, while core edged up to its highest reading since February 2024 at +0.8% y/y. Accordingly, the National Bureau of Statistics attributed the weak prices on extreme weather and global trade uncertainties, one we think could turn (albeit modestly) amid the current measures aimed at curbing disorderly competition in sectors like auto, starting August.
